But why is a forum so good for website marketing and what are the problems? Well, a forum is just people talking about whatever they want to. You as visitors owner set the topics to be discussed and act as a moderator. Whatever is on people's minds they can discuss and if it's on their minds, it could just be on other people's minds. So how does it work as far as gaining more visitors is concerned? Well every thread that's started adds more content to the site that the search engines should index and send traffic to. People posting on that thread will keep coming back to read replies and add further comments.br /

Sometimes posts will be a little controversial and will attract more visitors - through current visitors sending links to their friends and acquaintances. This is spreading the word of your website to a wider audience.br /

These visitors might not be adding directly to income, but especially if you are displaying pay per click adverts then you are bringing in traffic that might be clicking on these adverts.br /

You are also developing a base of regular readers. Some of these will sign up for your newsletters, others will browse your website and start to buy products and services. This is the aim! For just the effort of a forum and maintaining it, you have a continual stream of traffic.br /

You do need to appoint a moderator to be alert for posts that go a little too far - but as long as readers can flag posts then that shouldn't be a problem. And some people will try to fill posts with links to their websites. You either need to be checking for blatant self promotion or adding the tag rel="nofollow" to every hyperlink in posts.br /

There are plenty of off the shelf packages that can be used or use a custom built forum. Whereas a custom built solution might not have so many fancy features and can be a bit more basic, it can be linked into the site far more effectively. For example, recent posts can be displayed in the header of every page on the web site so that every visitor can see what is happening in the forum.br /
